The accursed, or some of them, were afterwards taken to Constantinople for trial, and their innocence fully established; and the Jewish commission from London, with others who interested themselves for the persecuted people, succeeded in obtaining a firman, dated Nov. 6th, 1840, patting an end to these cruelities both at Damascus and the island of Rhodes, and declaring that the Jewish should be protected, and should enjoy the same rights as other nations dependent on the Porte.

These accumulated statements of cruelities practiced upon the Jews, especially in Mohammedan countries, it taken by themselves, would undoubtedly give an exaggerated idea of their sufferings. It must be recollected, that vast numbers of them are too poor in appearance, to tempt cupidity; that their oppressors ireat them with some degree of leniency, as they do the brutes subjected to their service, from motives of self-interest; that the rulers often proported them from the malice of the people, in order that their own revenues may not suffer; that the natural feelings of humanity, quite extinct in no least subjects and story of the same at the first sufferings. "Yet now comes on a change. It is perceived of late that Bendemann is not the greatest painter of the time and that Meyerbeer, neither in invention, originality, nor purity of taste ought to be compared with the heroes of music; we are weary of prostitutions of life, genius and philosophy like those of Heine, and of the indiscreet, meanly suspicious, and partisan tone. We would, if possible, become more modest, consecrate ourselves as much as possible to production, and, where criticism is needed, use it in the way of examination, not of destruction. The nobler and more bonorable Jews, (and we are well aware that an honorable Jew represents honor in the severest sense, and and displeasure the proceedings of many of their nation, made usurious advantage from them to
